Dementia Evaluation for Those Identifying Concerns with Memory Loss

When you or someone you know identifies concerns about memory issues, a thorough medical evaluation is indicated. As there are many medical issues that might cause dementia-like symptoms, there are standard tests that help the physician explore the possible causes and arrive at a more confident diagnosis. Even if it is something irreversible like Alzheimer's disease, the earlier the diagnosis is made and treatment started, the stronger the possibility of a slower course. In some cases, your regular family doctor will be able to do the necessary evaluation. In some situations, he or she may want to refer the patient to a specialist, typically a neurologist, or an Alzheimer's screening clinic.

One of the most important aspects of the medical evaluation is the complete history and physical examination of the patient, which will include a thorough mental status and neurological examination.

The physician evaluating the patient may want to consider doing a series of studies/test to look for cases of treatable dementia. These might include:

- Complete blood count
- · Blood serology
- Electrolytes
- Thyroid function studies

- Serum B 12 level
- Sedimentation rate
- Urinalysis
- Brain Scan (MRI or PET scan)
- Neuropsychological testing

In selected patients, additional studies may be indicated, including:

- Spinal fluid studies
- Arterial blood gases
- ANA
- · Heavy metal screening
- Chest X-ray
- Electrocardiogram
- EEG

Even in the cases where no reversible cause is found, the neurologist can begin treatments that might slow the course of the disease and can be a great help to the patient and family in managing symptoms and issues that commonly emerge through the disease course.
